As mentioned, there are a lot of tools, but they're not all necessarily unique. Perhaps the biggest difference between the tools is that a panel with your tools in Photoshop looks a lot like a cluttered dashboard in a regular desktop version of Photoshop. You can see every tool at a glance, and if you're comfortable with your drawing technology, you can select whatever tool you want and drag or zoom and pan as you wish. However, there's no regular keyboard or mouse to click on and link the object. You use your fingers, even though the hardware multitouch buttons on the Pencil make it easy to select and draw an object. PhotoshopEdit is an iPad app that can synchronize your documents with your computer or other iPad. You can "continue editing" your document after it's been loaded or you can open an existing one and edit it on the spot. PhotoshopEdit is a very useful tool, even if you're not doing movie editing. Crafting an image from one of the images that you can find in your library can be a pain. Adobe has taken pains to compile a really good selection of perfect images to use in your images. The company behind the app — Adobe Stock — sells a lot of these images and also offers collections of images in a variety of categories. Once you find a design that you like and license that design, you can use it to create your own images in Photoshop Photoshop, add annotations, or leave notes in the image, and then upload it back into the Adobe Stock app.
